THEN AND NOW

A display honoring newspaper editors and publishers, who worked to build strong communities while writing and editing the news, has a new home in the Utah State Capitol.

It's the Newspaper Hall of Fame of the Utah Press Association (UPA), which was founded in 1893

when Utah was still a territory.

Featuring drawings and biographical sketches of the journalists (they must have been dead 10 years to be nominated for the honor), the 6-foot by 13-foot display has been relocated in a newly remodeled area of the Capitol and will be rededicated by former Gov. Calvin L. Rampton during a 2 p.m. ceremony Thursday, May 16.

Rampton first dedicated the display in 1975 when it was in another area in the statehouse.

State legislators and government officials have been invited. A reception will follow the ceremony in the Capitol rotunda.

files will highlight the lives of such publishers as the association's first president, Edwin A. Littlefield, of the Ogden Standard, and Dr. Willard Richards, Utah's first journalist and publisher beginning in 1850 of the Deseret News, the Mountain West's first newspaper.

It was Littlefield, known as "Major," who seemed to enjoy fighting battles in print. He is credited with saying, "The indolence of good men and the treachery of bad men Please see UPA on B2 ly dependent upon Salt Lake City being awarded the 1998 Winter Games. That decision will be made by the International Olympic Committee next month in Birmingham, England.

Jim Young, a Sports Authority board member from Provo, said he believes the rink may be built regardless of the IOC vote. Brems said there is definitely a need for ice in Utah County. A rink could be "successful, perhaps profitable" in Provo, he said.

Funding for the project, in either case, has yet to be determined. It is estimated to cost about $5 million.

"At this point, we really don't know how this is going to be funded," said Rex Loker, an architect with the state Division of Facilities Construction and Management.

Sports Authority board members said rinks in Provo and Salt Lake City would be paid for with revenues received from selling broadcast rights to the Olympics and from corporate sponsorships.

elected official, a third-degree felony. Utah code says that no official can receive or agree to receive compensation for a business transaction involving the city without first declaring so in a sworn statement or disclosing the compensation in an open public meeting.

In October, Cash signed a warranty deed authorizing the sale of lot No. 7 in the subdivision, according to a document on file in the recorder's office. He acted as the real estate agent in the transaction and allegedly received a commission ranging from $250 and $1,000, according to Bryson.

Cash is not commenting on the matter. Lehi businessman Russ Schneider said Cash is concerned about the emotional and financial costs of fighting a lawsuit.

"He was really down and told me he was wondering how long he could remain mayor," Bryson said.

City Council members contacted by the Deseret News said they were unaware of either transaction until contacted by the sheriff's office as part of an investigation on the sale of lot No. 7.

The investigation began when a resident contacted Councilman Keith Jenkins in February about the sale of lot No. 7. After some "basic checking" Jenkins learned the lot indeed had been sold without the council's knowledge.

He also learned that Cash was the real estate agent involved in the sale. Jenkins shared his information with two other council members, who told him they also were unaware the lot had been sold. Jenkins turned his information over to the state attorney general's office, which referred it the Utah County attorney's office.

Cash is scheduled to make a first appearance on the felony charge in 4th Circuit Court in American Fork on Thursday, May 16.
